I had the opportunity to judge C.M. Russell High School students as they presented their senior projects to their peers, current teachers and community members who served as judges. I came away impressed by their hard work and all of the knowledge they obtained in doing these year-long class projects.

More than 40 seniors completed projects. They selected the topic of their choice and devoted the whole year to perfecting their craft. Throughout the year, they must find and work with a mentor in their project field, complete at least 15 hours of community service pertaining to their topic and write a research paper before making their presentations in May. The panel of judges got to watch three different presentations and then filled out an evaluation form on each of them. The presenting students gave cards to the judges thanking them for coming and taking time out of their day to see their presentations.

Jamie McGraw, the senior project coordinator, deserves a lot of credit as well. She has been in charge of this project for the past three years, and I know she has put in a lot of time and effort in all the behind-the-scenes work. If you get the chance next May, please consider heading over to CMR to judge and see our future generation make some great presentations. Kudos to the seniors who participated and to McGraw for all the hard work.
